

Blood serum

Serum is a yellow fluid that remains after the coagulation of a blood sample, followed by a removal of the blood clot from the sample. It does not contain any cellular elements and clotting factors (such as fibrinogen), which distinguishes it from blood plasma. Both plasma and blood serum contain electrolytes, antibodies, hormones and other proteins that do not contribute to blood clotting.

References

Related articles

- Blood
- Plasma
- Plasma vs. Serum

Sources

- TROJAN, Stanislav; et al.,. Lékařská fyziologie. 4. edition. Praha: Grada, 2003. ISBN 80-247-0512-5.
- KITTNAR, Otomar; et al.,. Lékařská fyziologie. 1. edition. Praha: Grada, 2011. pp. 790. ISBN 978-80-247-3068-4.
- ŠVÍGLEROVÁ, Jitka. Krevní sérum [online]. Poslední revize 18. 2. 2009, [cit. 10.11.2010].
<https://web.archive.org/web/20160306065550/http://wiki.lfp-studium.cz/index.php/Krevní_sérum>.